HEALTH TIP

Killing Germs, and Environmental Pollutants

According to the World Health Organization, environmental and lifestyle factors contribute up to 80% of all known cancers. Environmental pollutants are a main source of carcinogens which contribute between 1-10% of all known cancers. What can we do to reduce our risk starting in our home?

Environmental pollutants in our home is one area that we may be able lower our exposure easily. I'm referring to toxic chemical cleaners. This week, we address the most common ones that many of us have in our home.

These toxic substances include:

Chemicals that are irritating or damaging to the skin and/or lungs and airways

Chemicals that can induce an allergic reaction and/or cause an increased sensitivity and this includes heightened sensitivities in those that suffer from respiratory diseases.

Chemicals which emit chemical molecules in the form of invisible gas which we inhale, that enter our lungs and thus bloodstream that are considered toxic.
